Question Part

Dear Principal,

I trust this finds you well.

I am writing in response to the proposed 'homework ban'. It is my understanding that our school is considering ~~an~~ banning homework altogether; this concerns me.

I've spoken to some of my classmates, and some pupils from this school who are in other years of their ~~st~~ school career, and the following has come to my ~~under~~ attention: 1) the younger pupils are, in majority, voting ~~the~~ in favour of the ban; 2) the older students are mostly against the ban.

One of the younger students, , has ~~the~~ taken a rather strong stance favouring the ban because she feels that the school hours are long and taxing enough as it is. Justification from her end includes some valid points such as her ~~household~~ home not having ~~que~~ quiet 'study areas'. But then she continues on ~~poin~~ points that don't seem to me good enough reasons to approve such a harsh stance ~~to~~ against homework as a whole. Perhaps her age has a role in ~~thi~~ her argument and ~~it be~~ it's begging the question, "Is she in a position, considering her age and level of experience, to comprehend the implications of banning homework?"

Question Part

Like I said, ~~th~~ I have interviewed (informally) some of my own classmates and they tend to believe that homework, albeit at times annoying and tedious, is actually quite important. My friend is the top student in our year and is ~~considering~~ set on going to ~~medical school~~ Medical School. I agree with him that it is in fact important to keep homework intact.

I'm wondering if there is a middle ground. I have taken both sides into serious consideration and I have come to the conclusion that: a total ban would not ~~me~~ be condusive to the students who are driven to perform well. It might also be a great disservice to those like who don't particularly seem ~~too~~ interested in purely academic achievement. But ~~because~~ just because ~~o~~ of the fact that not all students have the same drives and, values and hopes for the future, — we cannot ban homework at this school.

Like I previously mentioned, I was contemplating 'a middle ground', and strongly believe that ~~part~~ a good solution would be to have homework, but the school needs to make spaces available for the students who aren't in a position to do homework at home.

Banning homework would not be in the best interest of the students because it does have all the components of being out of school. Homework is ~~isdef~~ difinitely important to the development of skills that pertain to abilities that are imperative to fully function as an adult.

Question Part

To end off I would like to put in a formal plea to not ban homework and a kind request for the school to please make spaces for children who do not have an "area at home."

Thank you for taking time to read my letter. I am truly grateful for your time.

Sincerely,

(Grade 10)

Vanilla, sugar, cinnamon and caramel. That delightfully sweet smell coupled with violent screams of terror is what you can exped when you visit Disney World.

There is definitely something ~~epi~~ rather magical about being amongst a crowd of people all out for a thrill. The downside, as I'm sure anyone could guess, is that you have to wait in contrastingly long boring cues before experiencing any one of the array of adrenaline rushes available to you in such a popular theme park. I would not reccomend this place to anyone who does not have the patience to stand still for a minimum of 90 minutes before getting a turn. "Hurry up and wait!" — It should've been their slogan! But boy oh boy, let me tell you, those roller coasters are sure worth the ~~weight~~ wait.

The creators of Disney World spared no expense. The incredible details in rides like "The Tower of Terror" would leave you ~~fe~~ engulfed and enchanted while you wait for your nervous system to ~~rec~~ be stimulated to a point of near complete shock.

You'll crave that rush for ~~to~~ decades after your visit to that elevator that "falls" faster than the speed of gravity. As you exit that abandoned hotel, you'll be sure to find dust on your finger if you dare to touch the haunted ~~Floor Covered~~ walls.

Food. Characters from your favourite movies. Treats. Trinkets to remind you of all the excitement. Even The World. That's right. The World.

Question Part

I bet you didn't even know that you could set foot in 11 countries in one day!

Okay – not really. But you can actually get a taste of the people and places from around the globe when you make the 'completely overpriced' but totally worth-it' trip. And I'm telling you to go but my doing so comes with a warning: You will be hooked. You will want to go back and you will have to because it is ~~completly~~ completely 100% impossible – not improbable – impossible, to do everything there is available to you. We love it there. However...

~~Haver~~ ~~However...~~ Our family loves to go because we love to come back! Just as ~~a~~ incredible a feeling it is to ~~swost~~ swoosh down a roller coaster track in a tiny car, ~~[illegible]~~ that's how relaxing it is to crash on the sofa at home. Our living room is a safe haven for everyone and it has one really important factor in common with ~~the but~~ Disney World. People who visit our house never want to leave.

~~Big screen TV. Surround S~~
~~Big S~~
Big Screen TV. Surround sound. Comfy sofas. Popcorn for days. And two really cool dogs. The smell of clean laundry always fills the air. Big open spaces (not filled with irate families). Coffee! Loads of coffee. It's not perfect... in fact there's actually a lot wrong with it. The house needs a bit of work but you are literally just welcome to be snug as a bug in a rug on the couch with a dog or two in ~~at~~ whatever you want to wear. And relative to Disney World ~~there's~~; completely stress free.

You are free to bake in the kitchen. That big country style kitchen. Play ball outside. Ride your bike up and ~~down~~ down the long driveway. The yard is so big and spacious you would get lost if you looked only at the trees.

It would be okay to get lost because you could go chillout in the crystal clear water of my ~~swimm~~ swimming pool.

Ah yes! ~~you~~ You might bump into Dorothy at the completely stimulating parks at Disney World — but we all know she would agree — "There's no place like home."

It's true, Disney World might be big and thrilling. It is right when you say it's spellbinding and enthralling ~~Anyone who visits the~~ Anyone fortunate enough to go to a place that is filled to the ~~brim~~ brim with delightfully nuanced characters played by actors would certainly see the craftmanship of talented "Imagineers". But if you sit still in a corner watching the people go by, you would want some more ~~treat~~ soul...

My home is my heart. That's where you'll find my love. It's where you'll find my shelves ~~or~~ upon shelves of books. It's where I can have fun with my loved ones and where I take care of everyone.

Question	Part
