Dear Principle

Greetings and I hope I find you in good health and a complete state of mind. I am writing this letter to you in all humility in order for there to be a resolve on how this homework issue is to be tackled.

Before I address my concerns and potray my views on this matter, I would like to project and expound on my collegues views. Starting by the issue on why the ban is being considered. Not all students have the same family setups at home not all of them have access to some necessities other have. Some students spend long periods of time in transit and when they get home are too tired for anything else. Keeping up with having to be in a lesson every now and then and also studying for tests can weigh heavy on such students.

When taking a look at this matter from another point of view which opposes the ban. We see that homework is an essential part of learning and helps regular students on how to study for their exams in future. Being able to balance such a lifestyle is an essential part of their preparations to be adults, and for them to be incorporated into adulthood.

My take however does support the latter which is to keep the use of homework in practice. However ~~o~~ I propose that it is done with effective regulation so as to not disadvantage the student. Effective communication between the teacher and students is essential. Another important factor is communication of teachers amongst themselves and the creation of what may be a homework roaster. This will ensure that there is a maximisation of the students study potential.

Homework is a very useful part of learning but should be put to practice with suitable guidelines in order for it to be beneficial

Yours sincerely

The silent mornings of dawn are quite an experience at Balmain market at the heart of the big city.

As the light from the sunrise creeps from the horizon, you can see how the traffic of people at the market gradually increases. It increases from the quiet night where you see small portions set ablaze with small crowds around them to a slight ~~business~~ busyness.

The atmosphere starts to change and the surroundings come to life as the women of the market place start to set their tables. They do so ~~hurrily~~ hurringly some with unease as they anticipate the flood of willing buyers that will ~~to~~ flock to the market. Their children lend a helping hand, the little boys making sure the stands are ~~steds~~ steady. The little girls help their mothers to decorate ~~to~~ the stands, ~~A~~ some with their lustrious, but costly farm produce others with clothes and beautiful ornaments.

The men at the marketplace make preparations too, others lift the perfectly shaped pieces of carpentry as advertisement for all to see. Other men rise up and start their trucks ~~to~~ so as to make a profit from all those who want to hire their services.

The willing buyers coming from the city is whom they all await. Many of those who provide goods and services at Balmain call it "the centre of all monetary transactions" and to everyone who knows the place that is not hard to believe. From ~~dea~~ serene silence at dawn to deafening noises in the morning. All of those selling their farm produce shouting, so as to alert customers or potential customers of what each of them has.

A rat race of some sort is innitiated, and both customer and service provider are rushing everywhere. Customers trying to get the best but cheap products of the money they have. They pace up and down, to and fro trying to find the best deal at the market. Some doing so with a ~~hardful~~ handful of plastic bags with tomatoes, butternuts you name it everything they can find.

At its peak Balmain is barely habbitable, as every where you look you are bumping shoulders with people from all walks of life. Some mothers hold on tight to their toddlers as they carefully navigate the crowds so as to not leave them behind. Pick-pockets thrive in such an enviroment "Make sure when you visit Balmain you leave your valuables behind" is a commonly used line in these parts.

As the sun now sets you would think the crowding and the noise would die down, ~~but~~ it slightly reduces but not in a noticeable manner. Many are still buying and you can see smiles of success all over those with stands and tables at Balmain marketplace.

		The market slowly starts to experience a creeping silence as the cycle is about to restart itself again. The merchant woman and man go to sleep others in their carefully built cabins close by, others to much further destinations as they recount the profits of the day.
